

COMMENTARY

Social Movements and the Global Crisis: Organising Communication for Change

Anastasia Kavada

CAMRI, University of Westminster, GB

A.Kavada@westminster.ac.uk

This contribution suggests that social movements should be considered as ‘prophets of the present’ since they “announce what is taking shape even before its direction and content has become clear” (Melucci, 1996: 1). In this respect, movements like Occupy have pointed to the problems of a global crisis that is both economic and political. They have raised questions around the legitimacy and functioning of our democratic institutions and of representative democracy in general. Yet, what such movements express is not only a critique of the current system of governance, but also a willingness to reform it and to build new democratic institutions.

The fields of media and cultural studies have a lot to offer in this effort. Our focus on communication as both a process of meaning-making and an infrastructure of organizing can help us to reflect on our systems of governance and to imagine new ones. This is because by placing communication at the centre, we can observe from the ground up how collectives are created, how they function, how democratic this function is, and what are the visions, symbols and values that keep them together. Such collectives include not only social movements themselves, but also a variety of organizations and their systems of governance, like the European Union.

This contribution further argues that imagination is also required in the media studies field and in universities more generally to help them regain their role as both thought leaders and as spaces of passion and engagement with social change.

Keywords: Protest; digital activism; social movements; communication; Occupy; democracy; governance; globalisation

Download the audio file here: <https://doi.org/10.16997/wpcc.242.s1>

Competing Interests

The author has no competing interests to declare.

Author Information

Anastasia Kavada is currently a Senior Lecturer at the Department of Journalism & Mass Communication whose research focuses on the links between online tools and decentralized organizing practices, democratic decision-making, and the development of solidarity and a sense of common identity among participants in collective action. I have investigated a wide range of case studies, including the Global Justice Movement, Avaaz, and the Occupy movement.

Her work has appeared in journals, such including Media, Culture & Society and Information, Communication & Society and is on the advisory board of the International Journal of E-Politics and Interactions: Studies in Communication and Culture.

Reference

Melucci, A. (1996). Challenging Codes: Collective Action in the Information Age. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. DOI: <https://doi.org/10.1017/CBO9780511520891>

How to cite this article: Kavada, A. (2017). Social Movements and the Global Crisis: Organising Communication for Change. Westminster Papers in Communication and Culture, 12(1), 15–16, DOI: <https://doi.org/10.16997/wpcc.242>

Submitted: 15 December 2016 Accepted: 15 December 2016 Published: 30 January 2017

Copyright: © 2017 The Author(s). This is an open-access article distributed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (CC-BY 4.0), which permits unrestricted use, distribution, and reproduction in any medium, provided the original author and source are credited. See <http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>.

 Westminster Papers in Communication and Culture is a peer-reviewed open access journal published by University of Westminster Press

OPEN ACCESS 